- 1 When a group of people establish a way of life in which there are shared norms and values their behaviour and morality is described as their culture. A culture will include language, dress, food, material goods, skills and knowledge. More importantly perhaps, it will also include beliefs and ideas about appropriate forms of behaviour. The national culture of a country may be described as the pattern of conduct and beliefs that is shared by most or all of the population. However, there may be differences between the behaviour and thought processes of groups within any single country based on such factors as class, gender, age and ethnicity. Some sociologists think that cultural differences between countries and groups in modern industrial societies are disappearing due to the impact of globalisation.

The term community is sometimes used to describe all the people that share a similar culture, but it usually refers to a closer sense of identification between individuals in terms of co-operation and a sense of belonging. The idea of community is very important in understanding traditional rural societies where kinship ties and religion bind people together in a way of life that is slow to change and involves close relations with neighbours and family members. Industrialisation led to the breakdown of close-knit rural communities and their replacement by an urban way of life in which relations between people are more impersonal and there is greater individual freedom.

- 2 Much sociological research involves asking people questions using either questionnaires or interviews. Sociologists may also conduct research by using observation techniques, which involve watching and listening to the group under study and recording what is observed over time. There are two types of observation: participant observation and non-participant observation. Both types of observation can be carried out covertly or overtly.

In participant observation the researcher becomes part of the group that is to be studied. By taking part in the day-to-day activities of the group, the researcher can acquire a deeper understanding than would be possible using other research methods. However, it may be difficult to gain acceptance by the group to be studied. Participant observation may also give rise to ethical and legal problems. For these reasons, it may be preferable for the researcher to observe the group's activities without taking part in them. This is known as non-participant observation. Objectivity may be easier to achieve with non-participant observation than with participant observation.

- (a) What is meant by the term objectivity in sociological research?

- (b) Describe two reasons why the participant observer may find difficulty in gaining acceptance by the study group.

3 Writing in the nineteenth century, Karl Marx claimed that the capitalist economic system gave rise to two main social classes, which he named the proletariat and the bourgeoisie. Marx recognised that other classes existed, but he believed that they would gradually be absorbed into the two main classes as capitalism developed. This led Marx to predict that there would be an increasing polarisation of society between the proletariat and the bourgeoisie. Critics of Marx argue that rather than becoming polarised, social classes have become more fragmented since the nineteenth century.

By the time Max Weber was writing in the early twentieth century, a large middle class had emerged in capitalist societies. This led Weber to reject Marx's two class model of society. Weber actually identified four social classes: manual workers, petty bourgeoisie, professionals and property owners. But he distanced himself from Marx's economic determinism by arguing that there are many other divisions in society apart from those based on social class. Status divisions and power groupings are two other forms of social stratification that Weber emphasised.
