Real value in medical tourism

The saving a medical tourist makes on a procedure or a treatment depends, more than ever, on the exchange rate between the currency the medical tourist uses at home and the currency used at the medical destination.

Medical tourism value up in Mexico, Turkey and South Africa

Looking strictly at exchange rates, countries such as Mexico, Turkey and South Africa now may offer much better value for money than Thailand or Malaysia for medical travellers. India seems to be holding steady as a medical destination of value so far, although business interests in India are expressing concern that higher interest rates will result in a stronger rupee and reduce the country's global competitiveness.

Weak vs. strong currencies

Today, Brazil's currency, along with Thailand's, is strong and surgery costs in both countries have increased significantly for anyone paying in US dollars. According to World Bank figures, the cost of shoulder surgery in Brazil has increased between 2003 and 2010 by more than 60%, from US$5 600 to US$9 400.

By contrast, Indian, Mexican and Singaporean exchange rates have remained fairly steady and corresponding surgery costs relative to the US dollar have not changed much in the eight years the report considered.

Hidden value

As value in medical tourism shifts from Malaysia, Thailand or Brazil, other countries like Mexico, Turkey and South Africa begin to look more desirable as medical destinations. Even Vietnam, whose currency was devalued last year, may begin to attract travelling patients from Bangladesh, Burma and elsewhere that have previously had surgery in Thailand.

Indian tiger reserves may ban tourists

India's Supreme Court now has to decide, based on a recent petition, whether to accept proposals to move tourists to 'fringe' or 'buffer zones' outside core tiger habitats in order to protect the endangered species. The Government's National Tiger Conservation Authority (NTCA), which has filed the petition, puts the number of remaining tigers in India at 1 706, spread among 40 wildlife reserves.

However, according to Save the Tiger, a large Indian non-profit organisation, there are just 1 411 tigers left in India, down from around 40 000 in 1900. With tigers nearing extinction levels the Government has made several conservation initiatives, including www.projecttiger.nic.in, as have companies like telecom-provider Aircel with its 'Save Our Tigers' campaign.

Now the NTCA, which spends a large amount on conservation efforts that help to generate some US$40 million in visitor spending, has said that tourists have to be kept away from tiger habitats. Tourist lodges deep inside tiger reserves are said to block tigers' paths between forest parks and vehicles used by tourists in Bandhavgarh National Park recently killed two tigers.

If tourism has to be stopped in core areas, protection and patrolling will need to go up. The proposals could also negatively affect India's other tiger reserves. It should not happen that tourists are moved out and poachers replace them.

'Humans living in tiger reserves pose the biggest danger to tigers, not tourism,' said Belinda Wright, a volunteer with the Wildlife Protection Society of India.
